Top 12: Nike's 'Make a Difference' Campaign by David Torr This post is part of the Sakata Project, a series of blog posts about Sakata Weight, a popular new brand of exercise equipment. Sakata stands for "sense of balance." The Nike Sports Club is a 1,180-square-foot facility with an in-house strength and conditioning team that sponsors over 10,000 members of USA Fitness. In 2010, I worked in product development for Nike Sports Club. We were developing a line of fitness equipment to broaden the brand beyond running. The Sakata Project was a large-scale marketing and branding initiative designed to extend the reach of Nike's products and brand through more than 100 brands in 50 countries. Nike hired New York-based agency Laundry.'s to lead the project. There are three main themes for the program: Celebrate Life, Find Out Your True Power, and Make a Difference. This first theme, Celebrate Life, resonates with Nike's very strong social mission: promoting a positive world that encourages people to lead a healthy and meaningful life. The program features a number of print and digital media executions designed to reflect the theme of "Celebrate Life." The left side of the home page shows various Nike Sports Clubs, representing the wide variety of clubs in every market. There are quite a few clubs featured on this page. The "Make a Difference" section is the heart of the program. The basis of the Nike Sports Club line of fitness equipment is a large rotating platform that athletes use in an upright position to exercise their core muscles. The concept of balancing the body is what's promised. Over 40 different balance exercises are featured on the home page, which users can perform on the rotating platform, making it a total of 52 exercises. The rotating platform itself serves as a focal point. The platform is balanced with a low incline, making it perfect for balance and core exercise. The most unique element is the use of the weight plate. The plate weighs 33% of a standard weight plate, providing a full-body workout. N f678ea9f9e
